Summary:

Jason had a long patrol, so the last thing he wants to deal with when he gets home is four pups discussing how much food they should steal. Jason wasn't pleased, but he wouldn't throw the pups out to the streets. His nest was big enough.

Written for BW 366 Challenge - 5.04 - nest

Notes:

Yeah, I'm late with this fic and every other. Sorry about that. I'm in my last semester (of studying) in college and I'm working half-time, so I literally have no time. I have like three assignments due today and still have work left to do.

As many may have noticed there is (probably only this one) work at my page rn. The rest is not deleted, it's just on anonymous, I couldn't deal with them and that way I don't get the urges to delete them.

I hope to post most of the fics I've started and never had time to finish sometime in May. That includes the three-shot for DCxDP Omegaverse weekend, a couple more missing words for BW 366 and Omega Jason Todd week, which starts "checks the watch" too soon. Anyway, I'll make the series for that.

(See the end of the work for more notes.)

The rain was picking up and Jason decided to call it a night. The activity in the narrows was low, he hadn't even spotted any gangs that would usually rampage through the Alley. It seemed that the weather got to everyone and their mother, as most Gothamies stayed home, bundled in bed watching some shitty TV show. Jason didn't even own a TV and he was still running the surveillance program on his laptop, so the only thing he had left to do was a book.

The issue with webscraping...

- Most people who write fanfiction either a) don't mention whether they are writing in their native language or not or b) don't specify what their native language is
- It's hard to find out their native language without hunting down all of their social media
 - This isn't usually difficult (see next slide), but webscraping adds a whole other layer of complexity

Blanket Permission Statement

If you'd like to do fanart, translations, podfics, transformative works, fan bindings (or anything, really) of my stories, I would be absolutely honoured and you have blanket permission to do so – please just make sure to credit me and let me know if you do! <3

Exceptions/Caveats:

- Collaborations and/or big bangs; please ask about those first.
- For translations, I'd ask that they're not posted anywhere but on AO3.
- I cannot believe this has to be said, but this blanket permission applies to personal use only; I give no permission for fanbindings or other transformative works to be sold/commercially used in whatever way. In fact, I will materialize slenderman into your bedroom if you do, ffs. Thanks.

Please do not repost my fics anywhere or list them on goodreads or any similar spaces.

The issue with webscraping...

- Most people who write fanfiction either a) don't mention whether they are writing in their native language or not or b) don't specify what their native language is
- It's hard to find out their native language without hunting down all of their social media
- Archive of Our Own has profiles/bios available, but they aren't always filled with useful information
- People may end up discussing the native language of a CHARACTER and explaining their thought process while writing... usually, this brings me great joy, but I found myself rather irritated when trying to gather data

L1 Distributions (post-drop)

As you can see, very unbalanced...
... and mostly Indo-European

Future Explorations

- Trying to find more data; I was not logged into AO3 to scrape the pages, and many works are hidden from non-users...
- Sorting languages by language family
- Studying the use of hyphens & dashes (though, to be fair, I see most people who natively speak English use different dashes to represent an em-dash, and almost everyone uses a hyphen instead of an en-dash)
- Noting the use of sentence fragments versus proper sentences
- Once I get more experience webscraping, I could potentially search through their social media bios, which are much more likely to state which languages a person speaks
- See if there are apparent differences in translations versus originally-written-in-English works
